Bram Boo

Bram Boo, son of Belgian artist Bram Bogart, is an autodidact who works as an independent designer. For him, design is a way of life, a way to surprise. Boo's approach is as wide as the meaning of design is broad. He strives to find the right balance between function, technique, culture, emotion and personal input. By challenging the norm, he aspires to create new ideas and emotions with a focus on function and aesthetic values. Boo uses different techniques to achieve this desired element of surprise, but he usually starts with the functionality of an object and gives it his own personality. Not only are his designs surprising, but also unique and poetic. Bram Boo was named Belgian Designer of the Year in 2010 by Interieur Foundation and Knack Weekend.

Overdose

The Overdose is a series of workspace items inspired by the designer's own mess. Bram Boo's concept was to create order through disorder. The aesthetics of organized chaos bring movement and fun into an environment, a formal workplace or even at home. The Overdose desk has a powder coated steel base and a 50mm thick MDF top. The boxes of 4 different sizes are plywood finished with oiled European oak veneer. The Overdose's design was translated to a cabinet and a small wooden organiser.
